About The Seminar

"The unique position of business schools in the management education marketplace centres on their role as research institutions. New knowledge developed through the intellectual creativity and research efforts of business school faculty both shapes the content of business curricula in degree and non-degree education and enhances business practices. This unique role is threatened, however, by the turbulent marketplace in which business schools operate."

Business schools imparting management education are influenced by global business environment. Management education faces a number of issues and challenges in the globalized era in terms of pedagogy and technological innovations in teaching. This National Seminar on Faculty Development in Management Education: Opportunities and Challenges aims at providing an opportunity to management faculty to discuss varied issues like innovations in curriculum and pedagogy, suitability of global management practices in local markets etc. and to arrive at fruitful implications for future management teaching.
